This study investigated the occurrence of occupational accidents by microorganisms in health care sector in the state of Sao Paulo in the period from 2001 to 2004, in accordance with the Regulation of Service Quality. The results showed that the microorganisms responsible for accidents among health care workers belong to the species Mycobacterium tuberculosis (39.1%), Staphylococcus aureus (26.6%), Streptococcus pyogenes (11.8%) and Pseudomonas aeruginosa (2.3%). These cases represent 10.7% and 4.8% of the total accidents in this sector, respectively, during the period of investigation. The results of this study contribute to the fundamental and operational knowledge on occupational accidents by microorganisms, since this theme is generally neglected in international studies. What is pay-to-play? Understanding pay-to-play is one of the first things that first-time candidates for higher education funding should know before applying. It's a method of collecting student fees which requires students who are from lower-income families to pay for fees that they cannot pay. PTP, also known as pay to play, is a highly controversial policy in higher education. It's generally regarded as a legally forbidden practice which forces students from lower-income backgrounds to pay higher fees and access services that they may not be able to afford. PTP is often a scapegoat for situations of higher than acceptable student retention and accreditation rates. It's also an important topic for Minding the Campus, since it's one of the most common forms of student fees and is quite prevalent in Australian higher education. What is PTP? Pay-to-Play refers to a practice in which students from low-income backgrounds have to pay high fees to access courses and services which they may not be able to pay for themselves. However, in some cases, the institutions that offer PTP services include f30f4ceada
