What's new in Andromeda One:

: A Gantier Friend of Gaia The most important SF novel you'll read this year. Just published In Andromeda One, author Laura Mitchell deals a devastating critique of the notion of technologie (sic.) as the new magic during an intergalactic civil war. The result of that critique is a positive vision of human solutions, patched together from a variety of cultures across the galaxy. As a result, the novel directly challenges the trope of benevolent “IT” replacing archaic superstition in the humanities by offering a replacement that isn’t just different, but offers alternatives to both the remnants of Gaia and the technological utopias and worlds of the utopian sci-fi genre. I met Mitchell for a quick chat at her home in Portland, Oregon, last week. We spoke over instant messaging. I’d discovered her blog by sheer chance when looking for future screenwriting and post-apocalyptic fiction ideas; I enjoyed the first post, “Writing a New Star Trek,” and I imagine I’ll enjoy this one, too. You’re known for being an SF writer who’s embraced the tropes in the genre while writing stories that go beyond-well, beyond-what the label “SF” might imply. So, what are you trying to do with Andromeda One? The idea of flirting with the tropes of science fiction, even calling on that label, is something I’ve done for my whole writing career so far. I’m not here to reinforce any old ideas about the genre by just slapping it on a book. I’m saying, “If you can’t be yourself in the genre, if you can’t do whatever you want in it, then you’re not showing the real world around us that we see in the genre of science fiction. I don’t think that, as a genre, it can show so much more than that. It can, by using that language-or whatever label people are trying to use for that classification-but actually just looking at those main components of human life-family and personal relations, good and evil, science and technology, together-but when I talk about it in terms of personal relationships and all that stuff, then I have a chance to be able to extend what I look at, broaden that. I spend the bulk of my day on a Facebook page called, ‘Com
