----- TOP STORY — SAGA OF STUFF: In March 2002, I wrote an article describing my relationship with Dean Radin, a prominent paranormal researcher. I never published the article, and I never meant to. After all, I was a parapsychologist at the time. Moreover, I had very recently spent several weeks in a locked-room study with Radin and some other, random university “experts” on the subject of alleged “paranormal” experiences. It was an unsuccessful and very uncomfortable experience that left me wondering if I was just wasting my time. Somewhere along the line, however, I did publish the article. At first I was surprised by the amount of negative comments (although few, thanks to my self-monitoring editor). After a while, I found myself wondering what would happen if I published a positive article related to the paranormal. Perhaps I was just kidding myself. In any case, I decided I had some unfinished business and returned to Radin. I found myself rather disappointed. For one thing, his mood was completely different. For another, when we discussed the subject matter of his new book, I could feel that he was clearly more interested in making a social point than in pursuing any objective scientific discipline. The book is titled Entangled Minds, and it's about all the ways in which we are connected to people and events in our lives by way of so-called "energy fields." That would include telepathy, possession, poltergeists, and even some of the more playful and magical "paranormal" experiences that some people enjoy. Although there are legitimate researchers who keep a close eye on all of this, it's clear that paranormal belief attracts a lot of attention in the media. So it seemed to me that in order to continue to be relevant, a science-minded researcher like Radin would have to include this sort of "woo" in his research. Radin has continued to keep the links to the paranormal open and
