AutoCAD has two main applications: ■ CNC Drafting ■ Desktop Drafting AutoCAD users create and edit a wide variety of complex mechanical and architectural objects, including 2D and 3D drawings, exploded and solid views, surfaces and sections, imported and exported files, and other functions. The application is available in a wide variety of languages, including English, Spanish, Portuguese, and French. Its network compatibility enables it to be used with other AutoCAD applications and programs. In addition to the AutoCAD application, Autodesk offers various AutoCAD educational resources such as Autodesk University, AutoCAD Cast, Autodesk Learning Center, AutoCAD.info, and the Autodesk Community (registered users). The AutoCAD software was announced in November 1982 and was released in 1983. By the time of AutoCAD's release, the use of desktop computers to perform drafting tasks was already well established. Examples of this type of software include CAD 1D and 2D, IBM PureDraw and CAD/CAM, and Macrominds. Other software, particularly on mainframe and minicomputers, including Computer-aided design/computer-aided manufacturing (CAD/CAM), dBase, and MicroStation. AutoCAD is a commercial, fully featured, application. It costs between US$4,000 and US$24,000, and is available for use on Windows or Apple Macintosh computers. This article describes how AutoCAD is used in the automotive industry. It includes discussion of its most commonly used functions. A separate article, in this series, describes the interface. After testing and further development, AutoCAD 9 is now the standard AutoCAD application for both professional and novice users. You can download the latest version of AutoCAD for Windows and Mac from Autodesk's Web site: CNC (computerized numerical control) is a process in which programmed signals control the movements of a machine, in this case, a CNC (computerized numerical control) machine, which executes manufacturing operations. The machine is programmed to process a series of instructions via programming software or, in some cases, hardware programming hardware, according to the instructions received from the CNC machine's controller. It is used to control a
