Even if you've used Photoshop before, it's important to read over the software's manual in order to get acquainted with its features. Also, consider taking a class on it to learn the ins and outs. TIP Where can you get Photoshop tutorials? There are plenty of helpful resources on the Web. Try the popular Windows and Macintosh tutorials first.

Photo Sharing Sites You can share your images on photo sharing sites. They do a better job than you do at cropping and editing, although you can always do a little editing at the site. You can also upload and print to a physical store. You can find many of these sites free or for a small monthly fee. One of the best known is www.Photostash.com, which offers a huge selection of free and fee-based image-editing, image-sharing, and website-building software. You may even find some free resources available, such as scanner software. However, be aware of potential privacy and liability issues when you upload images from your camera or scanner. Most of these sites also offer a tutorial or a class. Some require a membership, but many are completely free. Uploading and Sharing Photos with Flickr Photosharing.com and Flickr.com are two of the best known services and photo communities on the Web today. Both have a free membership and offer a robust digital ecosystem that includes tools to edit, share, tag, track, and enhance your photos. It's also a good idea to back up your images on Flickr before they are altered. You can do this by uploading your photo to a Flickr album that is private to you. When you make some changes to a photo, you can then upload it to an album that is shared with your Flickr friends. The Flickr website also offers some features that are extremely helpful and fun to users. You can even get a keyword feature that makes the photos in your photo album searchable. Here are a few other features you can take advantage of:

Have fun with your photos: You can search for similar photos by using the terms you typed into the search bar at the top of the site. When you click on the photo, you can see which photos have been uploaded by other users or which photos have been tagged to you.

You can also play around with your Flickr account's various tools. For example, you can turn a photo into a collage, create a photo album, and create a Flickr

Q: How to use an array of different data type in a loop? I'm trying to parse an array of floats and strings from a file, and then loop through these values, but I don't know what data type to use in the array. It will be an array of different data types (all float and string). What should I use? I'm parsing a file with different data types on each line. Thank you.

A: You can use std::vector.

Vector
vectorOfFloats; //fill the vector
Vector
vectorOfStrings; //fill the vector
for(int
i=0;i>element; }
for(int
i=0;i>*(vectorOfStrings[i]); }

The aim of this study was to assess the clinical results of forefoot and midfoot arthroereisis in the treatment of hallux valgus. Between 2005 and 2009, 92 forefoot arthroereisis and 60 midfoot arthroereisis procedures were performed on 84 patients by a single surgeon. A retrospective review was performed on the clinical data collected. The same hallux contact stress test was used pre-operatively and post-operatively. Outcome data were compared between patients treated with forefoot and midfoot arthroereisis. Statistical analysis was performed using a paired Student's t test.
