Q: SSL support for multiple domains using a single SNI certificate I'm developing a small web server in C. I'd like to support multiple domains in a directory-like way, with `public_html`, `docroot/` and `vhost_subdomains` as subsections. To try to simplify the process of configuring this, I'm generating a single SSL certificate, and plan to split it into separate certificates for each site. One option I've considered is to use a single SNI certificate, which would allow my web server to listen on a single port for multiple domains. What I'd like to know is how to get multiple domains to use the same certificate? I'd imagine that this requires the SSL client to know the hostname(s) I want it to connect to, and to provide the hostname(s) during the handshake. The problem is, I don't want clients to have to specify the hostnames because then I would have to write a separate filter to extract that information out of the certificate, or some other kind of mess. Is there any way to get multiple domains to use the same certificate without having to split the certificate into separate certificates? I'm looking for SSL support that's as similar to using multiple IP addresses on a single IP, as possible. (Something like this would be nice: A: The short answer is, it is not possible. You would need to have different certificates for each URL and not even Google's SSL Check can tell you that. (You can, however, build all of your request URLs using the list of IPs served by the certificate of your root server. Each IP would be to a directory on your site. For example, if your root site has the IP address x.x.x.x and you have a site that's named www.example.com, then a request to x.x.x.x/www.example.com would be satisfied with your certificate). Also, it's worth noting that if you use a SNI-based certificate with a single IP address, the browser will not even give a single IP address to the server. It will use the IP address of the root server. So your site will still look like `yoursite.com:443` to the browser. Voltage dividers are used in electrical

---
