As far as I know there is no general rule on how a software development team should be arranged. There are some good practices and bad practices. These can be found in books, articles, and many other places. But nevertheless, it seems that most developers I know are acquainted with the bad practices. Since we get lots of options when hiring developers, one might think that one of those options would be ideal. Should I rather not look for a team where everyone knows each other (if possible)? A: Your team isn't ideal because one of the developers is on an extended leave, so you need to fill that position and add the knowledge and expertise of that person to the team, so that it can continue its development without stopping it. Or maybe you are thinking that you need to give that person a new team and a new perspective and in doing so, they will shed their bad practices and get closer to the idealized team. Or maybe you think that you c6a93da74d
